

I am strongly against the filing by BellSouth to stop regulating broadband service. I am very happy with the options independent providers such as Sonic provide and if the service and product offered by BellSouth is as good as they tell their consumers it is, then there is no need to change the competitive landscape.

It is important to side with "the little guy" on this issue. Otherwise, we may as well leave the big phone companies to run the communications sector on their own. They will monopolise the market and drive prices up rather than down.

Competition is good for everyone - companies and consumers alike - and the only way to assure that innovations develop and products and services improve is to promote competition. There is no other way.
